

Hearing Loss at the Crossroads: We Want to Choose the Right Path—So Why Do We So Often Choose the Wrong One?

When we come to a communications crossroad, why is it that almost universally we hard of hearing people typically use hearing loss coping strategies that do not help us understand conversations better? You would think that because of our hearing losses, we (hard of hearing people) would instinctively employ coping strategies aimed at bringing success—but generally we don't. Instead, by default, we take the wrong path. Why? The answer will surprise you.

At the April meeting of the CHHA - North Shore Branch, Neil Bauman, Ph.D., a hearing loss coping skills specialist (and himself a lifelong hard of hearing person) will explain exactly why we so often employ poor coping strategies. Much more importantly, he will demonstrate how we can deliberately choose to replace our instinctively poor hearing loss coping strategies with coping strategies that bring success. You will not want to miss his dynamic presentation based on Key Number 2 from his book, “Keys to Successfully Living with Your Hearing Loss.”
